Advice of Consumer's Affairs

Beware of fake security warning screens that suddenly appear while using the Internet

These consultations have been increasing lately. While using the Internet, a warning screen, such as "Your PC is infected with a virus.", popped up on the display suddenly, and you felt so anxious and nervous that you downloaded the fake security software. However, that was a fake warning screen, and you found out you didn't need to download it. At the same time, the cancellation procedure did not proceed as you expected.

Advice for PC users

- Even if a warning screen is displayed, do not contact nor download it.
- If you can't judge whether it is a false warning, please consult with the Information-Technology Promotion (IPA). Please see the IPA website for how to deal with the problems regarding security software, if you have installed one or if the warning screen does not disappear.

Contact the Consumer's Affairs Center asap, when you feel strange or worried.
